The Life of William Law: A Timeline	ix
1. Concerning the nature and extent of Christian devotion	1
2. An inquiry into the reason, why the generality of Christians fall so far short of the holiness and devotion of Christianity	11
3. Of the great danger and folly, of not intending to be as eminent and exemplary as we can, in the practice of all Christian virtues	19
4. We can please God in no state or employment of life, but by intending and devoting it all to His honor and glory	31
5. Persons that are free from the necessity of labor and employments are to consider themselves as devoted to God in a higher degree	45
6. Containing the great obligations, and the great advantages of making a wise and religious use of our estates and fortunes	53
7. How the imprudent use of an estate corrupts all the tempers of the mind, and fills the heart with poor and ridiculous passions, through the whole course of life; represented in the character of Flavia	62

8. How the wise and pious use of an estate naturally carries us to great perfection in all the virtues of the Christian life; represented in the character of Miranda 69
9. Containing some reflections upon the life of Miranda, and showing how it may, and ought to be imitated by all her sex 80
10. Showing how all orders and ranks of men and women, of all ages, are obliged to devote themselves unto God 94
11. Showing how great devotion fills our lives with the greatest peace and happiness that can be enjoyed in this world 109
12. The happiness of a life wholly devoted to God further proved, from the vanity, the sensuality, and the ridiculous poor enjoyments, which they are forced to take up with who live according to their own humors. This represented in various characters 125
13. That not only a life of vanity, or sensuality, but even the most regular kind of life, that is not governed by great devotion, sufficiently shows its miseries, its wants and emptiness, to the eyes of all the world. This represented in various characters 138
14. Concerning that part of devotion which relates to times and hours of prayer. Of daily early prayer in the morning. How we are to improve our forms of prayer, and how to increase the spirit of devotion 152

15. Of chanting, or singing of psalms in our private devotions. Of the excellence and benefit of this kind of devotion. Of the great effects it has upon our hearts. Of the means of performing it in the best manner 174
16. Recommending devotions at nine o'clock in the morning, called in Scripture the third hour of the day. The subject of these prayers is humility 191
17. Showing how difficult the practice of humility is made, by the general spirit and temper of the world. How Christianity requires us to live contrary to the world 203
18. Showing how the education which men generally receive in their youth makes the doctrines of humility difficult to be practiced. The spirit of a better education represented in the character of Paternus 216
19. Showing how the method of educating daughters makes it difficult for them to enter into the spirit of Christian humility. How miserably they are injured and abused by such an education. The spirit of a better education represented in the character of Eusebia 231
20. Recommending devotion at twelve o'clock, called in Scripture the sixth hour of the day. This frequency of devotion equally desirable by all orders of people. Universal love is here recommended to be the subject of prayer at this hour. Of intercession, as an act of universal love 251

21. Of the necessity and benefit of intercession, considered as an exercise of universal love. How all orders of men are to pray and intercede with God for one another. How naturally such intercession amends and reforms the hearts of those that use it 273

22. Recommending devotion at three o'clock, called in Scripture the ninth hour of the day. The subject of prayer at this hour is resignation to the Divine pleasure. The nature and duty of conformity to the will of God, in all our actions and designs 291

23. Of evening prayer. Of the nature and necessity of examination. How we are to be particular in the confession of all our sins. How we are to fill our minds with a just horror and dread of all sin 304

24. The conclusion. Of the excellence and greatness of a devout spirit 318
